

panels are bolted from the inside and when released can be lifted up and outwards. The shop window has intact shutters (six panels) locked in by a horizontal bar at the base. Below is a skirting board with three panels of bolection mouldings. Above is a two part transom light with curved corners and above the door another plain transom light with a flat segmental head. The residence door is elaborate with bolection mouldings and pyramidal panels, late coloured glass side lights and likewise side-lights in the transom, but the central transom pane has been replaced. A flat timber segmental head of unusual character surmounts the transom light. Piers on either side of the building and between the residence door and shop window, frame the composition and are in bluestone with tooled edges.

On the southern side of the building (the York Street elevation) the original sign of "Pinsent, Signwriter," and an early street sign (York Street) are visible.

The interior of the shop (the front room) has had the partitions removed from it and has a deal boarded ceiling. The hall and the second room have intact doors, cornices and roses, but have otherwise been re-decorated. The banister, in very good condition, finishes in a spiral rather than newel post. The doors opening off the upper landing are in original condition with the mouldings in black and the rest varnished. The front landing has much of the original brown floral wallpaper intact. There is a wide stairwell light with intact etched blue and ruby glass. The doors and mouldings, in original condition, are more elaborate and are picked out in black and other stains. The upstairs front room has an intact marble fireplace (with one servant bell on either side) and a glass fronted bookshelf. The front windows can be raised for stepping out.

A simple two storey corner hotel built in 1873 and subsequently remodelled on the ground floor in c.1920. The upper floor facade is intact and very plain - only a projecting cornice breaks up an otherwise unmodelled facade. It is likely that the building originally had a verandah.

This building is of importance as a corner streetscape element along Brunswick Street.
