SIGNIFICANCE

White Hills Cemetery, set aside in 1860-70s<sup>1</sup> and continuously developed and still in use as a cemetery is of regional significance:

- * as a reserve for significant exotic species, particularly those listed on the National Trust Register of Significant Trees;
- * for its collection of trees and plants; these are typical of nineteenth century cemeteries in Victoria and demonstrate strong associational links with their cemetery setting;
- * for its collection of buildings and structures; these include representative examples of typical features such as entrance gates, fencing, a rotunda and headstones;
- * for its considerable aesthetic appeal derived from mature trees and shrubs, undulating site, sense of enclosure and vistas both within the site, views out of the site and from the exterior into the site;
- * for its strong historical and social links with the City of Bendigo, exemplified by its long continuity of use for its original purpose, its links with early development of the town and its prominence within the life and society of Bendigo.<sup>1</sup>

1987 Letters and press cuttings about Council's proposal to level many of the Chinese graves and mounds between the headstones. It was believed that the site would be more attractive to tourists if 'tidied up'.

Remains from the old Sandhurst cemetery (once on the edge of Rosalind Park) are thought to have been buried at White Hills in a mass grave (after acquisition of the land by the agricultural society) but no evidence exists other than the memorial on one grave noting that the body once was buried at the old cemetery.

Many of the area's important figures were buried here including Morris Collman (8 hour movement, mine manager) members of the Cohn, O'Keefe and Goyne families while the work of the renowned William Beebe (as Beebe & Son) is evident on the Roeder grave. The Celtic cross group in the Catholic section near the entry is also thought to be of some importance<sup>2</sup>. The sexton's lodge has long since gone, reputedly having matched the lodge(s) at Bendigo cemetery<sup>3</sup>.

DESCRIPTION

The roughly triangular, undulating site is bounded by Holdsworth Road, St Kilian Street and Plumridge Street and slopes from the high point on St Kilian Street down to lower land along Holdsworth Road.

The main entrance is from Holdsworth Road where an impressive set of gates are in poor repair. To the immediate interior are a pair of very large Ficus macrophylla and next to these a pair of Carob trees (Ceratonia siliqua). The wrought iron fence extends a short distance along the street.

A sinuous path system with individual loops is similar to the Back Creek Cemetery, whereby the paths determine the denominational boundaries of the cemetery. A central path bisects the site extending from an entrance at the corner of St Kilian Street and Holdsworth Road towards the north east corner almost but not quite intersecting the centre of Plumridge Street.

The mature planting is a dominant element of the site in particular the various pines such as Pinus halepensis, P. pinea and P. canariensis and Schinus molle var. areira. The only structure in the cemetery is an octagonal rotunda in very poor condition. This is located on the path system to the north west of the main entrance; again in a location not unlike the very similar rotunda at the Back Creek Cemetery. The grounds contain a significant section of Chinese burials and headstones.
